

It is often believed that accessing clean water is a basic human need, however it is really expensive to provide clean water to the public that is free of cost. I completely disagree with this statement because it will increase the amount of total debt relevant with the water project, especially for an underdeveloped country and distributing water in houses that are situated in dry mountain regions are quite challenging.

First of all, it can create a chance of massive downfall to the economy of an underdeveloped country. Since to provide free water supply, it takes a huge amount of money to fund the project. If the water supply is given free of charge, it will be nearly impossible to collect the amount to repay the concerning bodies who are in charged of this project. For instance, the certain government of a country usually negotiates with an international NGO that funds these types of government project. If the water supply is given to local people without charge, the government will not be able to repay the same amount of money back to the project funders.

Secondly, it will be really tough for the government to distribute the water supplies to some areas that are difficult to reach, especially mountain regions where there is no sources of water or no rainfall. For example, the local residents usually collects the water from the ground during the time of raining. If there is no rainfall, then the local people should rely on the concerning authorites for water supply and distributing it in such region can be quite challenging. Hence, they should take a minimum amount of charges that seems affordable to the public for providing water.

In conclusion, every home should have a water supply that is provided with limited amount of charge to avoid the economical debt and difficulty in transportation.

,but yet
; However, svo

I am good at studying mathematics However I usually procrastinate
I am good at studying mathematics, but. yet/ still/however I usually procrastinate

I am good at studying mathematics; on the other hand, I usually procrastinate